Melanesian leaders were challenged to take the lead in changing the way the world does business. Embarking on a sustainable development approach that will prevent the loss of biodiversity is vital in achieving economic growth. This “Green Concept” was a challenge issued to the Melanesian Spearhead Group leaders at a side event in March.

Residents of Sawaieke realize that indigenous tree species which were once part of their surroundings are fewer than earlier days and in some extreme cases, no longer there. All the eight communities in the Sawaieke district, in Gau, will now be better informed on what their land can be best used for.

WWF South Pacific is developing its Sugar Programme for Fiji which aims to assist the sugar industry in reducing its ecological footprint and minimising its effects on biodiversity. The project is looking to grow internationally and Fiji is one of the first countries that is part of that expansion.

With its pristine beaches and breathtaking underwater beauty, the Coral Triangle is undoubtedly one of the most sought-after holiday and diving destinations in the world. Sadly, this has also placed tremendous pressure on the environment.

A database system that tracks the protection and management of regional sea turtles is now being managed at the WWF South Pacific Fiji.

What does Accounting and Climate Change have in common? A lot in fact. If you ask Sanjay Kumar what the link is, the most likely answer he would give is everything.

Why we are here
To stop the degradation of the planet’s natural environment and to build a future in which humans live in harmony with nature.
